

I am writing to say that the FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections. Before the act was put into place last year my husband and I would receive several calls a night from telephone solicitors. We got to the point that we would not answer the phone because we were tired of dealing with salespeople. Now that we are on the no-call list we can enjoy a peaceful night at home. Our phone is no longer tied up by people we don't want to talk to. Being able to call people at home is not a right, it is a nuisance. The state of Indiana has taken steps to protect its citizens, please do not undo their work by passing a law allowing salespeople to call again.
